THE DIVISION of Veterinary Medicine at Iowa State College will graduate 66 men on May 29. It has required an average of 6.7 years of college work for these men to receive a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine degree. Eight also have B. S. degrees, one a B. A. and one an A. B. degree.

The class ranges in age from 23 to 35 years with most of them falling in the 24-25 year age group. Only seventeen members of the class are veterans.

Seventy percent of the class is married which is slightly higher than the 1958 class but about the same as the 1954-57 classes. Forty-six of the seniors are married and 20 of these have children. The two largest families have four children and the total number of children is 35.

As the final year of professional training draws to a close, many of the men have definite post-graduate plans. Forty-one have indicated they plan to be engaged in general practice, many of which will be doing predominately large animal work. Most plan to work on a salary for six months to three years before becoming partners. Only four of the members of the class plan to establish their own practice when they graduate. Definite preference for small animal practice has been stated by nine class members, three are considering institutional work and four may enter government work. The other nine men expect to enter military service soon after graduation.

Nearly 50 percent of the class expect to remain in Iowa. Four plan to go to Illinois, three to Minnesota, two to Wisconsin and one each to California, South Dakota, Nebraska, Indiana, Pennsylvania and Utah.
