an inclusion body surrounded by a halo and the chromatin as margined against the nuclear membrane. True, this is a conspicuous stage and one commonly found but if the cell pathology is to be of further diagnostic value it is desirable to have all of the events from the earliest to the latest, and whenever possible to have them separated from death changes. The following remarks will indicate what is meant. When the inclusion body first appears in the submaxillary gland disease it hardly disturbs the normal organization of the nucleus. Then follows a breakdown of the linin net-work and the pulling away of the chromatin toward the nuclear membrane. After the chromatin reaches the margin, it reverses its movements and crosses the halo to rejoin the inclusion body to which it attaches so firmly that centrifugation will not separate it. It requires ten days to two weeks for the duct cells to attain this condition. They become greatly hypertrophied in the process and it is significant that the cell maintains a normal nucleo-cytoplasmic ratio (if one deducts the volume of the inclusion body from the nucleus). In fox encephalitis a peculiar reaction occurs in the early stages. At the time when the basichromatin is marginating toward the nuclear membrane, the oxychromatin separates from it and moves in the opposite direction, namely, toward the inclusion body which it encompasses. Thus, the inclusion body of fox encephalitis is not quite the same as that of the submaxillary gland disease although they are both of type B. As a third example, the inclusions associated with the subcutaneous injections of aluminum oxide resemble in their early stages a plasmosome nucleolus but later become free of all basichromatin and are
