New Editor of Veterinary Medicine

Dr. C. M. Cooper

The new editor of Veterinary Medicine is Dr. C. M. Cooper, a 1949 graduate of Iowa State College. How a sickness, a disability, a term as editor of the Veterinary Student and an interest in promoting veterinary public relations contributed to his serving the veterinary profession in this important way is very interesting.

Dr. Cooper was born in southwestern Wisconsin Dec. 8, 1924. He received an early indoctrination of the problems of the local farmers as he often rode with the local veterinarian and from his father who taught vocational agriculture. His earliest memories of a veterinary practice are of washing thousands of blood tubes and running to the post office for more vaccine during the equine encephalomyelitis epidemics of the mid-thirties.

Dr. Cooper decided to become a veterinarian before finishing the eighth grade even though a minor battle with polio seemed to cast some doubt as to the wisdom of this choice. After high school, he completed the prescribed pre-veterinary training at the University of Wisconsin. He then served a term in the maritime service and was admitted to the first post-war class of veterinary medicine at Iowa State. While in veterinary school, he served two years as editor of the Veterinary Student.

Dr. Cooper established a practice at Montfort, Wis. after graduation from Iowa State College in 1949. Practice was good, but the old polio disability and an acute case of brucellosis prompted him to sell it and join the professional department of Jensen-Salsbery Laboratories, Inc. While there, he served as editor of The Jen-Sal Journal and after an 8-year executive development program, assumed the position of research director. Shortly after this, Dr. Cooper was shocked by the news of the sudden passing of his esteemed friend and editor of Veterinary Medicine, Dr. Robert Anderes. Because of a long time interest in the contributions of this publication and a strong desire to have its policies and plans carried on, he accepted the editorship of Veterinary Medicine Oct. 1, 1958.

While still in veterinary school, Dr. Cooper married Phyllis McCracken, a 1947 graduate of Iowa State. They have three children: Lynn Marie, 8; Larry, 6; and Earl, 4. With a Wisconsin heritage, the Cooper family has retained a great interest in fishing and swimming. They live on the bank of a small private lake about 15 miles from Kansas City, Kan.

Dr. Cooper is active in the Kansas City Veterinary Medical Association, and holds membership in three state associations. The local Episcopal church takes up about all of his spare time as he serves on the vestry of the church, leads a youth group and sings in the church choir.

In his present assignment, Dr. Cooper looks forward to the challenge of journalistic leadership Veterinary Medicine has supplied since 1905 to a constantly growing profession, and to the opportunity to further explore his deep concern for the public relations of our profession.
